

Frog-Fear

Frog-Fear tells the story of Kevin Carter, a third-generation Irish-American born in 1922, trying to find his way in the world. Like many young men of his generation, in the aftermath of Pearl Harbor Kevin Carter rushes out to join the army. Due to his educational background - he is just one semester away from graduation from the Carnegie Institute of Technology's civil engineering program - and the fact that his father runs the massively successful de Groot construction corporation, Kevin is quickly elevated to a Lieutenant in the construction corps, and sent to build custom-fitted runways throughout the South Pacific. After the war, Lieutenant Carter returns home to work for his father at de Groot Construction, but longs to revisit his first base in the Pacific, a little tropical islet by the name of Maraton. So with his father's blessing, he hires a ship and crew, and undertakes the journey, but on the way his own arrogance almost gets him killed. Seriously injured, his mind spins out a series of strange events. Is it a nervous breakdown? Is anything that is happening even real?
