

Tam o the Scoots

Lieutenant Bridgeman went out over the German line and strafed a depot. He stayed a while to locate a new gun position and was caught between three strong batteries of Archies. Reports? said the wing commander. Well, Bridgeman isn't back and Tam said he saw him nose-dive behind the German trenches. So the report was made to Headquarters and Headquarters sent forward a long account of air flights for publication in the days communique, adding, One of our machines did not return. But, A doot if hes killit, said Tam; [Pg 2]he flattened oot before he reached airth an flew aroond a bit. Wi ye no ask Mr. Lasky, sir-r, hes just in? Mr. Lasky was a bright-faced lad who, in ordinary circumstances, might have been looking forward to his leaving-book from Eton, but now had to his credit divers bombed dumps and three enemy airmen. He met the brown-faced, red-haired, awkwardly built youth whom all the Flying Corps called Tam. Ah, Tam, said Lasky reproachfully, I was looking for youI wanted you badly. Tam chuckled.
